

The very high-speed challenge

22 Workshops & Seminars - 22 November 2005

At a time when broadband is becoming increasingly ubiquitous, particularly through the deployment of ADSL, carriers and some regional governments are now turning to very high-speed and wireless technologies, in a bid to anticipate users' future needs, and to distinguish themselves by increasing the appeal of their region. With the help of telcos and industry players, the goal of this half day of debate is to gain a perspective on the most promising technological platforms, and to take a look at the projects in this area being carried out by regional government.
